

Acknowledgments

I owe many people a great deal of thanks for helping me make this book possible. Without their talent, dedication, and guidance, I would not have been able to compose the text or the accompanying instructor guides and case studies.

First, I would like to express my gratitude to Michael Miller of the Federal Acquisition Institute (FAI) for his extraordinary support in assisting me with this effort. Not only does Mike deserve full credit for giving me the encouragement to write the book, but he was also responsible for obtaining FAI sponsorship for the new course. Mike also provided me with much needed guidance on what the book should cover, particularly on the chapters covering competitive discussions and post-award negotiations. Moreover, this book is filled with many instances of Mike's useful suggestions, to include numerous paragraphs where his comments are written in precisely the same manner in which he stated them. But more importantly, Mike provided me with the support and friendship I needed during some difficult times to make everything come about. Without question, Mike's contribution to this project was truly indispensable. Without Mike, I would have lacked both the resources and the reassurance I needed to complete this undertaking.

Next I would like to thank the members of the interagency curriculum review committee who reviewed the text and offered many beneficial suggestions for improving the material. This committee, which comprised of contracting executives and educators from throughout the federal government, greatly enhanced both the accuracy and readability of the text. The nine person CRIC, as it was called, consisted of the following members:

Richard Chittenden (Naval Facilities Contract Training Center),
Allen A. Baumann (Defense Logistics Agency),
William Callaway (Air Force Aeronautical Systems Center),
William G. Smith (Air Force F-16 Program Management Office),
Mary Ridgway (National Aeronautical and Space Administration),
Larry Sawler (Department of Transportation),
Clem Munno (Department of Commerce),
Rose Mary Swindell (Navy Acquisition Management Training Office), and Patrick Conley (General Services Administration).

In particular, I am indebted to Chittenden, Baumann, and Callaway for undertaking special research projects to help me in certain crucial areas.

I also want to acknowledge the efforts the educational support contractor, HumRRO International, for their work in editing and formatting the course material. Besides excelling in their editorial duties, the HumRRO representatives undertook the formidable task of coordinating the CRIC meetings by insuring all the committee members received the latest drafts of the book chapters beforehand with enough time for review.

Finally, I want to express my thanks to many people at the Air Force Institute of Technology (AFIT) who assisted me and provided much needed encouragement. I obtained many useful comments from my students when I "tested" the material in class. Leslie Guinto, my administrative assistant, provided invaluable support. Many of my AFIT colleagues also provided good recommendations and friendly encouragement. But I am particularly indebted to Leo Mercier who gave me the initial guidance to pursue this subject area. Leo's continuing counsel also provided me with the advice and reassurance I needed to stay on course and maintain my sanity.
